Providing mental health care is vital and we need our mental health workforce now more than ever. The mental health sector is rapidly expanding and are looking for more dedicated and talented people to join our ranks. We have the ambition to grow our workforce by more than 27,000 people by 2023/24. A mental health nurse works as part of a multi-disciplinary team alongside a lot of other qualified medical professionals so that patients get the best all-round care and treatment. The multi-disciplinary team includes GPs, psychologists, social workers, psychiatrists, occupational therapists, arts therapists, healthcare assistants. This course allows you to specialise in mental health nursing, providing both an academic qualification and the vocational training to become a registered nurse underpinned by key themes: developing reflective practitioners with skills in critical thinking, evidence-based practice and life-long learning. As a mental health nurse, you'll help people with mental health conditions by supporting their recovery or helping them to live independently while improving their quality of life. You may advise on suitable therapies, activities or groups. As a mental health nurse, you work in the community and spend the morning visiting people's homes, helping them have a good quality of life and manage their mental health problems. You always involve families and other healthcare workers to make the best plans to care for someone because you know it can involve talking treatments. Mental health nursing means working with individuals within a close professional relationship to help them achieve self-care and independence. This is a development process for the person being cared for and requires that the nurse has the highest levels of interpersonal and intrapersonal skill. This course focuses on contemporary approaches in the support and treatment available for people with mental health problems.
